"I, Sappho, shall be one —
With all high things forever; and my face
Seen once — my songs once heard in a strange place,
Cleave to men's lives, and waste the days thereof
With gladness, and strange sadness, and with love "

19. William the Silent,

Prince of Orange, disposing of his Jewels, to carry on the War of the Netherlands.

Motley, the historian of the Dutch Republic, has ably portrayed the noble character of William, Prince of Orange. In the second volume, in the account of the terrible campaign in the Netherlands of the Duke of Alva, at the head of the Spanish army, the historian vividly describes the heroism and devotion of the patriot leader. The country had been devastated, the Prince was proscribed, his property declared confiscated, the people were terror-stricken and paralyzed. Realizing the necessity of upholding the national cause, William sought to rally once more the people around the patriotic standard. A modest but lofty courage moved him, and selling his jewels, his plate, his furniture, which were of almost regal magnificence, with unbroken spirit, "he hazarded all his possessions, his luxury, his fortune, his family, his life, his children, with the calm convictions of a statesman." Three times in this terrible and unequal war did William raise money for the payment of his army by the pawning or the sale of his personal effects.

This picture represents the assembling of William, his family, and his tried adherents, in his own home, to negotiate a sale to the Jewish bankers and brokers. Before them are spread the household treasures, and, while anxious for their assistance, the Prince protests, with calm dignity, against the extortions of the money-lenders.
